Variability will play a crucial role in how the climate will evolve over the next few decades, especially on regional scales. This seminar will explore some of the constraints that internal climate variability places on the precision with which future projections can be made. In addition, I will summarise some recent work on estimating and understanding Arctic predictability on seasonal timescales.